BOY OF 12 ENDS LIFE WITH BULLET AFTER SCOLDING.

Charles Jaeger Had Taken Money to "Blow" Chums on Birthday.

The chums who were to have gathered to-day to help celebrate Charles A. Jaeger's twelfth birthday at No. 221 Cedar Avenue, Richmond Hill, fled solemnly in to mourn. For Charles, or "Fatty," as he was affectionately called, killed himself because of a scolding.

The boy, in planning for the entertainment he was to give the "gang," found he was short of money. He picked up some loose change left lying around by his father, Andrew Jaeger, a salesman. As "Fatty" whistled his way out the door with his school books and the money, his father called him back and reprimanded him, telling him he could have had the money for the asking. Mr. Jaeger went away to business. "Fatty" sulked upstairs to his room. When he failed to come home for luncheon his aunt, Miss Louisa Jaeger, housekeeper for the family, thought nothing of it. The boy often remained in the yard of Public School No. 14, so intent on play that he forgot his lunch. But when the boy failed to appear in the evening she became alarmed and questioned his sister Amelia, fourteen, who attends the same school. The last I saw of him was when he went upstairs," the girl replied. "He was marked absent at school." Thinking the boy ill, the aunt and sister ran up to his bedroom. The door was locked. Their shouts brought no response. They broke the lock with a hammer. The boy lay inert across the bed-beside him lay a revolver. A bullet had passed into his right temple, killing him. He had been dead three mornings. Nobody had heard the shot. Questioned by the police, the father explained that he had scolded the boy in the spirit of correcting him rather than of punishment. The police arrested Jaeger on the charge of having a revolver in his possession without a permit.
